The Legend of Lake Jackson

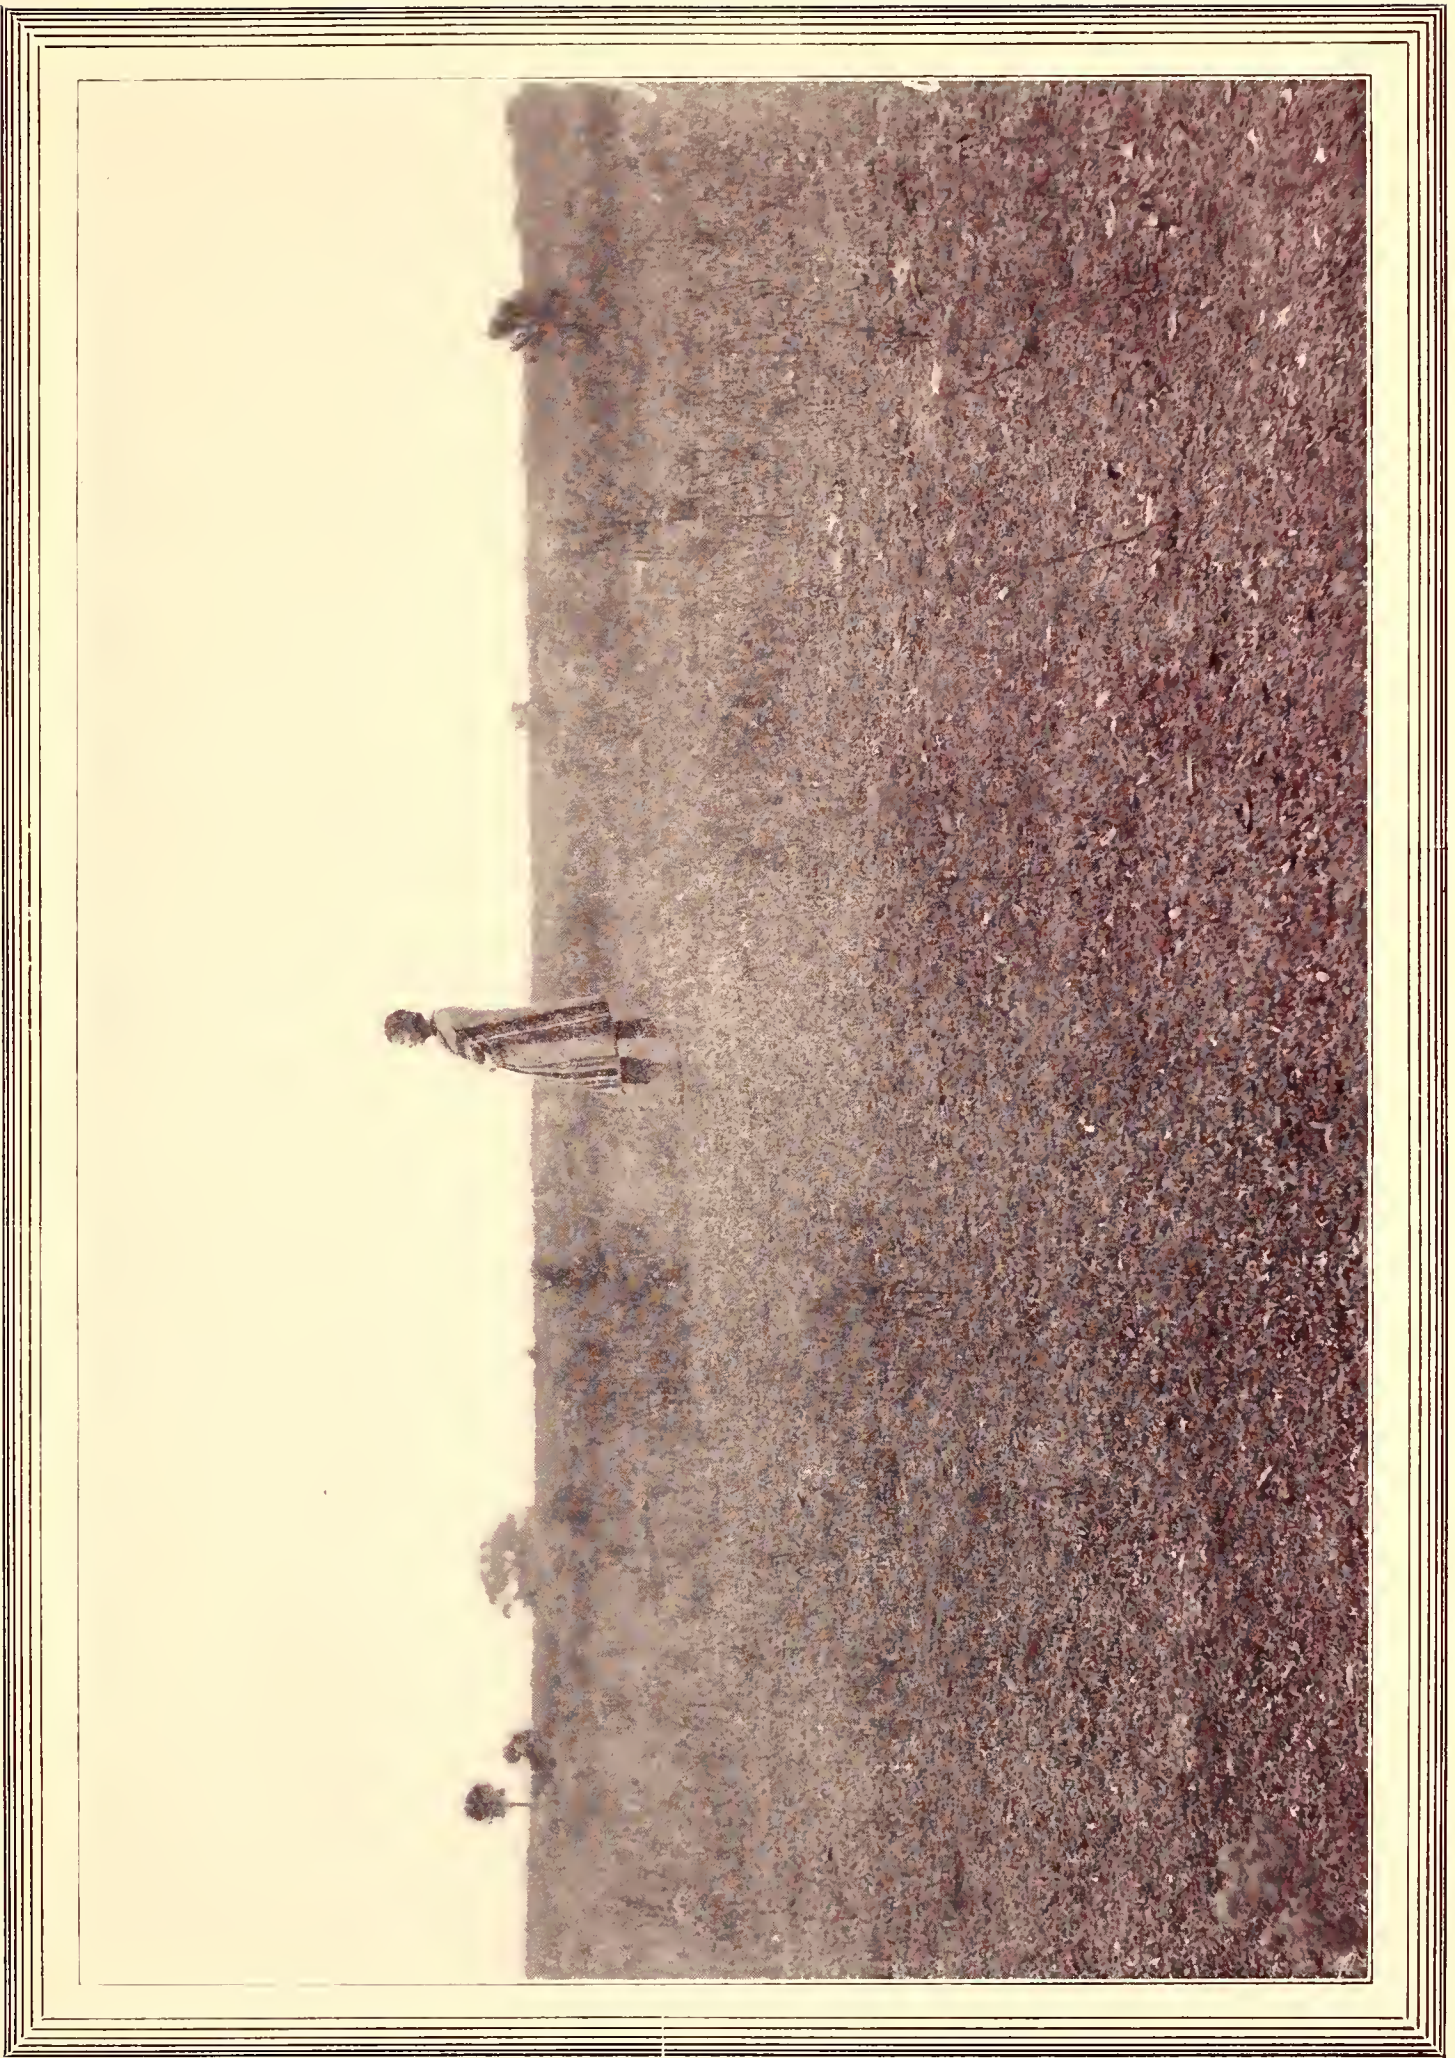

Ayabala

Humming Bird was the daughter of Micco, the Great Chief, who long before the coming of the white men, ruled the people who dwelt between the waters of the East and of the West. Humming Bird was beloved by all who knew her, and many a young warrior sought her for his bride.

One warrior especially, more manly and strong and handsome than any of his companions, wooed her, but he was young and had as yet won no name.

For days he wandered through the forest. He prayed and fasted, and spent night after night without sleeping. One night as he lay by the fire he had kindled in the woods, he was aroused by the hiss of a serpent, and saw coiled before him a great rattlesnake, about to strike. He seized it in his powerful grasp and dragged it, subdued to his will, but unhurt, to the feet of Humming Bird. Now a name was his reward, and the Great Chief said, "You are now Micco-Espoke (Rattle-Snake King). You have proved your cunning and strength. But the Rattle-Snake is the friend of man. You must win over an enemy before you can have the hand of Humming Bird."

The young man went forth again, this time with a war party, and when he returned, his comrades told of his triumphs over the enemies of his tribe. He showed the scalps of his victims to the Chief, and his heart beat high with the hope of reward.

"Your name is Ashtamalutka, Brave Warrior," declared the Chief. Then his voice faltered and his eye dimmed, for Humming Bird was his only child and dearer than life to him. He was unwilling to give her in marriage and sought delay that he might keep her longer. So he bade the lover bring a gift worthy of her loveliness and typical of her virgin beauty.

In his eager search through field and forest, the warrior lover came upon a beautiful milk-white doe and her still more beautiful fawn. Forgetting the reverence due to the white deer, he pursued and overtook them. He garlanded them with vines of grape and jessamine, and led them, unresisting in their meek gentleness to Humming Bird.

Surely no more beautiful gift was ever brought to maiden, and the presence of the white deer were believed most auspicious.

"Cunning, brave, and swift of foot, you are," declared the Chief, "And you shall be called Man-wahnee, Swift of Foot. At the Bosketah, in the sight of all my people, she shall become your bride."

The Bosketah, or Feast of Green Corn, is held in the late summer at the time of the harvesting of the corn. It is the greatest occasion of the year, the harvest, the thanksgiving, the time of games, of dances, of feats of skill and strength. Then old friendships are renewed, old wrongs forgiven, and then no tribe goes on the warpath. It is then the time of betrothals, the time when honors are bestowed, and the greatly prized name delivered. What time is more fitting for the marriage of Indian man and maid?

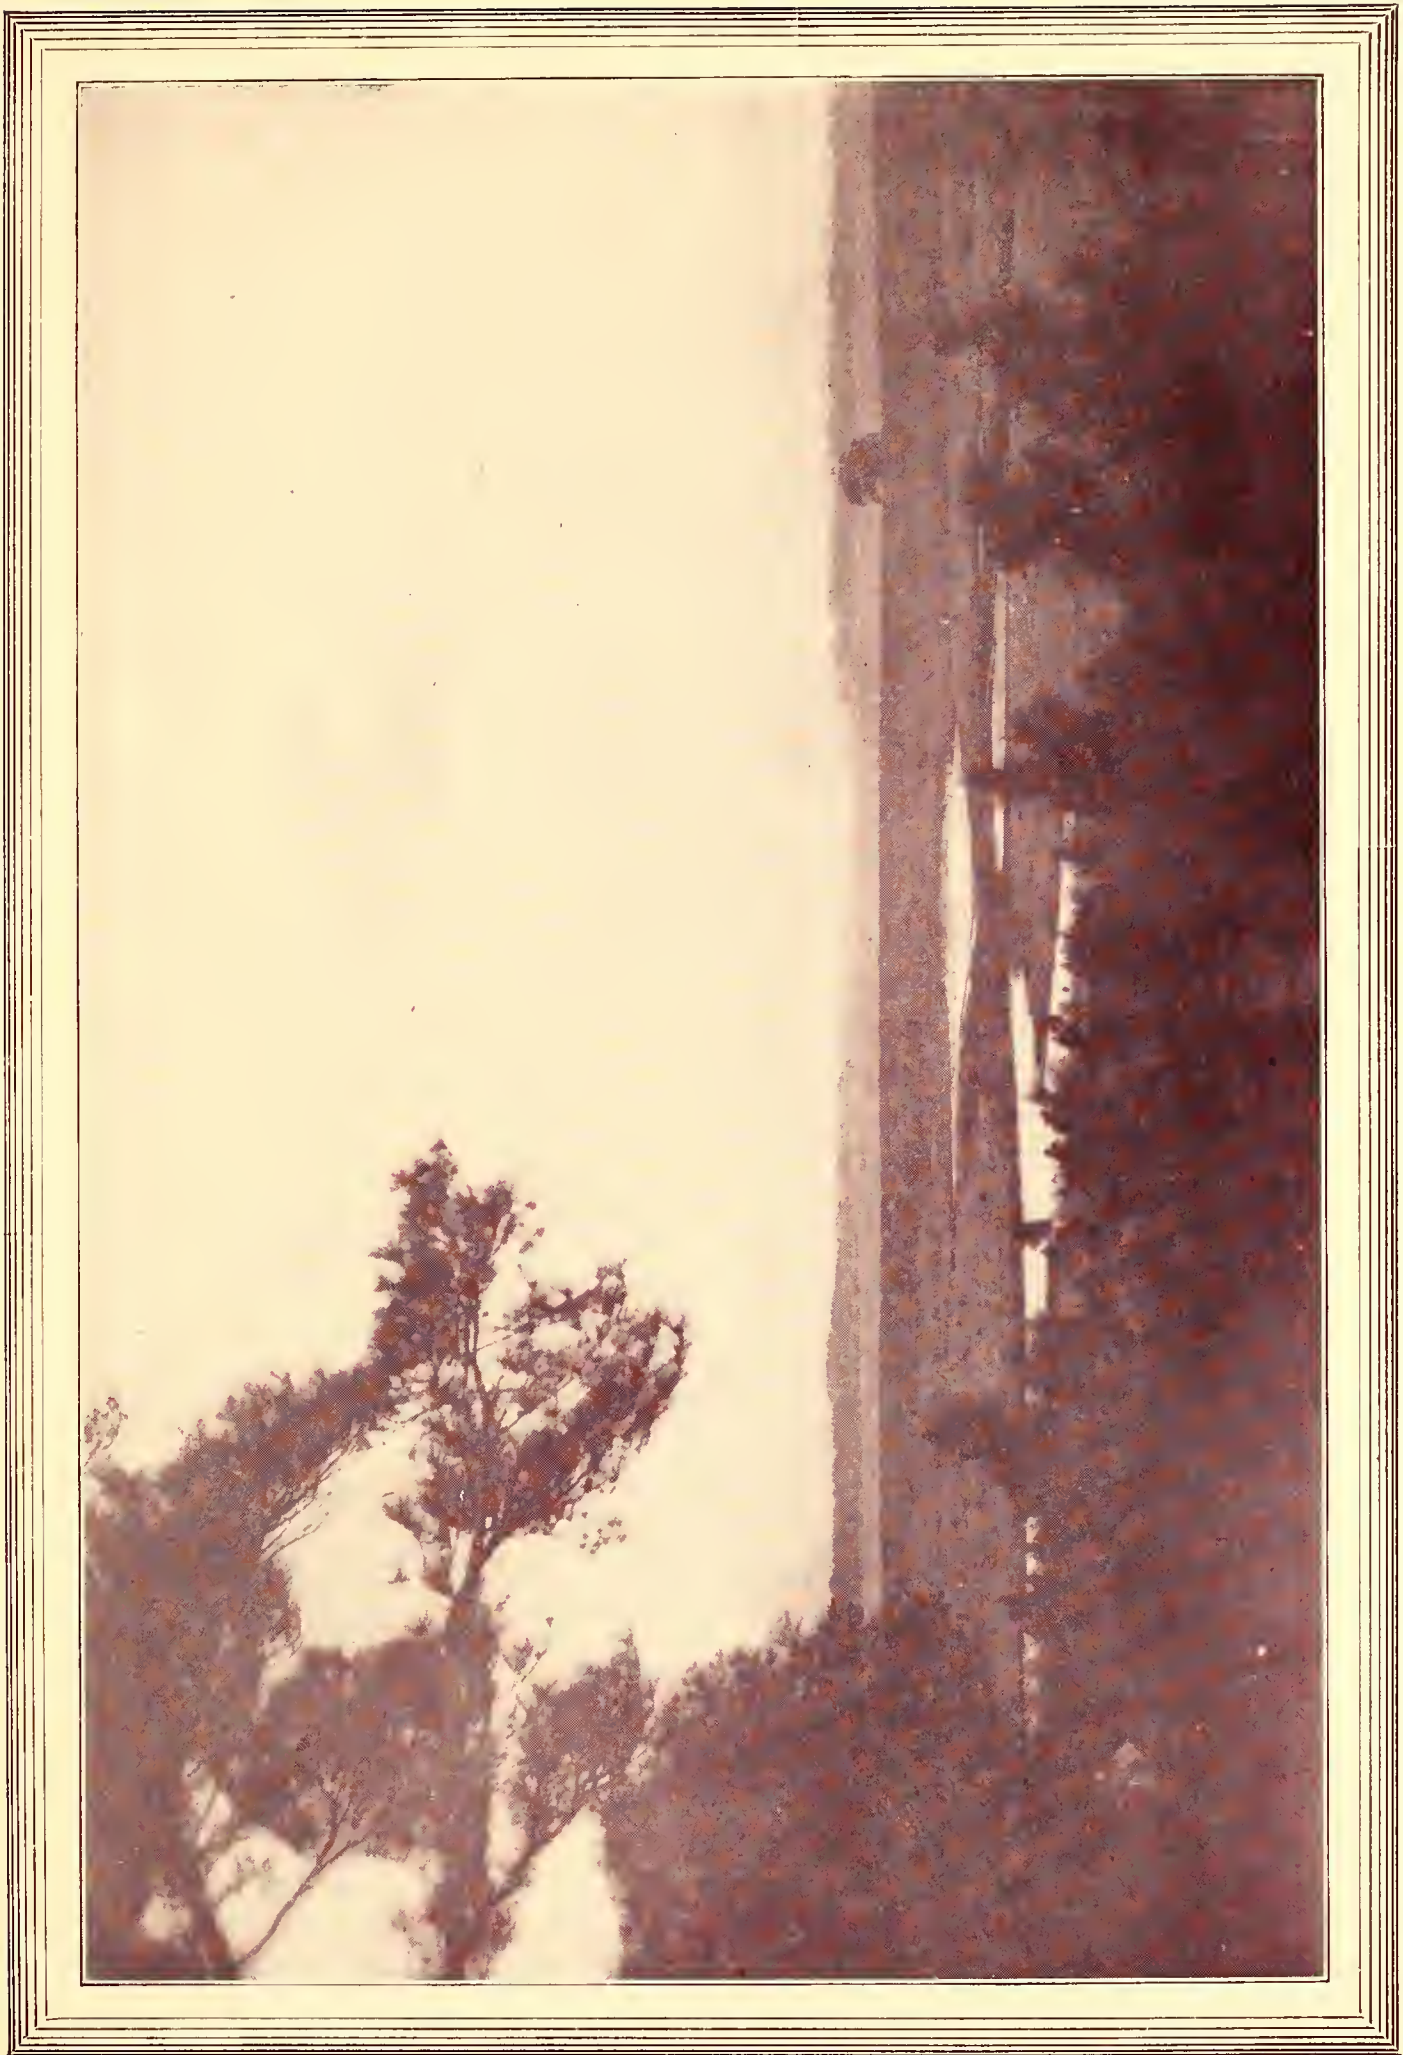

After many games and dances in celebration of the marriage feast, it was proposed that there should be a race, the happy lovers trying their fleetness against the fleetness of the white deer and doe—the lovely animals that had followed here and there the light, graceful footsteps of Humming Bird.

The race was begun, and the young men and women followed as best they could, the older people watching from the Bosketah field.

On and on went the flight, on and on. No longer merry applause but silence, no longer mirth but wondering anxiety.

Suddenly the troubled watchers beheld a mist arise over the extensive meadow, and almost at the same time a column of water arose to a wonderful height, and fell flooding the meadow. Thus the origin of the lake, known to the Indians as Ayavala.

Around the borders of this lake spring lilies, white, blue and yellow, and these are the spirits of the brave and gay throng that were drowned at the marriage.

And in the Bosketah season every year, the spirit of the bride is seen greeting, in a deep and passionate kiss, these water lilies and spirits of the wedding guests. At long intervals, the flood subsides, and the meadow is restored. Then is seen a white doe, with a faint shadow of a woeful man, walking by her side, always drooping, always walking, always seeking.

Written by Miss Caroline Mays Brevard.
